Statement 2

Form 990

Part III

Statement of Program Service Accomplishments

Too often the debate over creative control tends to the extremes. At one pole is a vision of total control, a world in which every last use of a work is regulated and in which "all rights reserved" is the norm. At the other end is a vision of anarchy, a world in which creators enjoy a wide range of freedom but are left vulnerable to exploitation. Balance, compromise, and moderation, once the driving forces of a copyright system that valued innovation and protection equally, have become endangered species.

Creative Commons is working to revive these principles. We use private rights to create public goods: creative works set free for certain uses. Like the free software and open-source movements, our ends are cooperative and community-minded, but our means are voluntary and libertarian. We work to offer creators a best-of-both-worlds way to protect their works while encouraging certain uses of them: to declare "some rights reserved."

Thus, a single goal unites Creative Commons' current and future projects: to build a layer of reasonable, flexible copyright in the face of increasingly restrictive default rules. This overarching mission has two dimensions, one practical and one symbolic. On the practical side, we want to build the sum of creative material, whether owned or public domain, free for re-use by the public. On the symbolic side, we view every project as an opportunity to lay out an alternative vision of copyright, and to offer the public a simple way to voice their support for that vision. Few if any such outlets for systematized civic expression exist in the world of intellectual property today.

Our licensing project officially launched in December of 2002, and in 2003, we accomplished a great deal to further our mission:

Creative Commons Licenses: In December 2002, we launched our suite of Creative Commons copyright licenses. Each license allows an author to retain his or her copyright while allowing certain uses of his or her work. Creators come to our site and, from an intuitive menu, choose the combination of conditions that best reflects their preference. The options include an attribution requirement; a prohibition on commercial use; a restriction on derivative works; and a requirement that licensees "share alike" by releasing derived content under the same license they received. After choosing, the author receives a standard license expressed in three forms: human-readable (plain language and icons), lawyer-readable (the nitty-gritty that spells out the details), and machine-readable (a "metadata" expression of the licenses' key provisions). Through 2003, we made great progress with license adoption in several respects:

Widespread Adoption: By January 2004, more than 1 million web pages carried Creative Commons licenses; the growth rate of license adoption in 2003 was 50% per quarter.

Application Embedding: The Creative Commons licensing selection process was been embedded into applications such as Movable Type (a prominent blogging software), SnapGallery (a photo publishing software), and Adobe's XMP standard. This enables content producers conveniently to pick a license at the time of creation.

<http://creativecommons.org>

Notable Adopters: By the end of 2003, many large, notable projects had adopted Creative Commons licenses, including:

The Public Library of Science: a top-flight, open-access scientific journal led by Nobel Laureate Harold Varmus and available for free under the most permissive Creative Commons license

Common Content: a repository of Creative Commons licensed works

Opsound: an open-sound music community all based on Creative Commons licenses

MIT's OpenCourseware project: free online educational resources from one of the premier scientific institutions in the world

Oyez Supreme Court Archive: a collection of U.S. Supreme Court audio recordings that go back as far as 1955

Internet Archive: open-source text, video, and audio projects

Rice Connexions: free online educational resources available through a unique interactive courseware system

Multimedia Training Kit: free comprehensive media training curriculum targeted at developing nations, sponsored by UNESCO

The International Commons (iCommons): Launched in 2003, iCommons is an extension of our licensing project, dedicated to the drafting and eventual adoption of country-specific licenses. Imagine our licenses as the legal code processed by the respective legal "operating systems" of various countries. The aim of iCommons is to port the licenses for use across those different legal operating systems. This will involve both the literal and legal translation of the licenses by teams of volunteers in various countries around the world. By the end of 2003, eight draft licenses had already been completed and were in a public review process.

Founders' Copyright: The Framers of the U.S. Constitution understood that copyright was about balance – a trade-off between public and private gain, society-wide innovation and creative reward. In 1790, the U.S.'s first copyright law granted authors a monopoly right over their creations for 14 years, with the option of renewing that monopoly for another 14 years. The Founders' Copyright is a legal tool that lets copyright holders voluntarily re-create this policy by promising to release their work to the public domain after a 14- or 28-year term. The first adopter of the Founders' Copyright is O'Reilly & Associates, world-renowned publishers of technology handbooks. In April 2003, O'Reilly released hundreds of titles under the Founders' Copyright. Several other authors have volunteered to free their content under the FC license, and in April 2003 Creative Commons launched a web-based process by which more can participate.

Marketing & Education: Creative Commons' accomplishments also include a number of smaller projects and activities aimed at furthering the expressive and symbolic aspects of our mission. These include ongoing educational efforts: maintaining the widely read Creative Commons weblog; producing the popular 7-minute Flash animation "Get Creative," which explains

<http://creativecommons.org>

Creative Commons' mission in the language of artists; creating a set of educational comic strips explaining the copyright licenses in detail; publishing monthly profiles of authors and artists who use Creative Commons licenses; producing a series of freely copyable CD anthologies of CC-licensed music; and producing a year-end flash video "Reticulum Rex," which details the years accomplishments, and lays out a vision for the future. The staff, members of the Board of Directors, and Creative Commons' technical advisors also routinely appear on panels and give public addresses on Creative Commons at events from Seoul, Korea, to Washington, D.C., to Oslo, Norway. Creative Commons also made an appearance at the World Summit on the Information Society. Staffers contributed articles on copyright and Creative Commons to the Public Library of Science, Syllabus Magazine, and other publications.

Technology: An integral part of Creative Commons' model is to rely on the intelligence and potential of the Internet to facilitate the location of distributed content through the use of metadata (a.k.a., "semantic search"). By the end of 2003, we completed a beta Creative Commons semantic search engine - the first of its kind to find works that are "some rights reserved." We developed a protocol for embedding license information into MP3 files, and specified a standard way for verifying the validity of metadata, as demonstrated in our metadata embedding recommendations for MP3s. We are working closely the Worldwide Web Consortium to further these efforts, and have become a member. We also built a new application called "Mixer," a content management system, that enables musicians' to link their works to one another, promoting the idea of building on each others content.

Licenses: In addition to the standard suite of licenses, we were able to make a few more options available:

-Sampling License: Creative Commons first considered offering a Sampling License at the suggestion of collagist People Like Us (a.k.a. Vicki Bennett) and Negativland, the appropriationist art collective that has since served as the public discussion lead during the license drafting process. During this process, and thanks to FGV Law School, we learned that Gilberto Gil, Brazil's Minister of Culture had long been thinking along similar lines. We combined these independent inspirations and, before long, had new licenses to offer to the public. The Sampling licenses encourage sampling and collage of content, but allow artists to prohibit verbatim copies, if they choose. The license soft-launched in December of 2003.

-CC-GNU-GPL: Creative Commons wrapped the Free Software Foundation's, General Public License, with a human-readable commons deed, and machine-readable metadata. The government of Brazil adopted this license in December of 2003.

Other Notable Projects for 2003:

-Moving Image Contest: We began a contest to create a 2-minute moving image that explains the Creative Commons' mission. Entries were received and final judging completed in 2004.

-Get Content: A new section of our site devoted to the promotion and reuse of content
